Trust the Story | A New Way | Welcome

What does welcome look like?

Think about the time you felt welcomed. Not welcome in the sense of being “allowed” inside somewhere, but truly welcomed into a community – a new family, a new job, a new home, a new school, etc. – with wholehearted love, warmth, support and joy.

- What was that experience like?

In this text, Abraham kills his best calf to prepare a feast for strangers who show up at his door. Sarah also springs into action, baking bread for their unexpected guests. Despite the hardships they’d been experiencing in their own lives, they are enthusiastic about extending hospitality.

- When have you shown hospitality like this? Why did you do it? How did it make you feel?

One of the themes you could find in the Abraham/Sarah story is about hospitality: a family leaving their comfortable lives in their home to go out into the world and bless other people in any way they could. Despite the scarcity of the wilderness and the struggle of the journey, they leave their comfort zone to help others. This was a countercultural idea at the time.

- Does it still feel like a countercultural idea today?
In a time when money feels tight, the future feels uncertain, and the economy feels unstable, does it make sense to treat strangers who show up at your door to a five-star meal? Why or why not?
Do Abraham and Sarah seem particularly remarkable? Why do they do it?

These strangers, who turn out to be messengers, give Abraham and Sarah a promise: that they will have a child. The whole story starts with a welcome. Abraham and Sarah lived open-handed, and through their open-handed welcome of these strangers, they receive a promise and the world changes. Sarah becomes the carrier of this promise, giving birth to Isaac who becomes the father of Jacob, who is named Israel.

- What would have happened if Abraham and Sarah met these strangers with a closed hand instead?
What if they would have sent the strangers on their way instead of inviting them in?
- Is this story transactional? Is hospitality the price Abraham and Sarah paid for a baby?
Or does filling the world with abundant hospitality simply breed life and love in all kinds of ways?
What is the difference?
- How does living with open hands and open arms change the way you experience your own life?
Are you more able to see inspiration and hope when you live that way? Why, or why not?
